

Sermonia, Lhorenz Ernest
Group - 6

The Locked Diary

Erin had always been curious. When she saw her aunt's diary locked away in a drawer, she couldn't resist the urge to peek inside. The small key hung from the keyhole, taunting her. Erin knew it was wrong to invade someone's privacy, but her curiosity got the best of her.

Late at night, when everyone was asleep, Erin tiptoed to her aunt's room. She opened the drawer, took the diary, and examined it closely. The cover was worn, and the pages yellowed with age. Erin inserted the key and turned it carefully, afraid of making any noise.

Inside, the diary was filled with secrets. Her aunt wrote about her love affairs, her heartaches, and her deepest fears. Erin was both fascinated and horrified by what she read. She had never seen her aunt in this light before.

One day, Erin couldn't resist the temptation to read the diary again. She went to her aunt's room and opened the drawer. But this time, the diary was gone. The small key was still there, dangling from the keyhole. Erin's heart raced. She searched frantically for the diary, but it was nowhere to be found.

Days turned into weeks, and Erin couldn't shake off the feeling of guilt and shame. She had betrayed her aunt's trust, and now she had lost the diary forever. Erin learned a valuable lesson that day. Sometimes, the things we are most curious about should remain locked away.

In the end, Erin apologized to her aunt and promised never to invade her privacy again. She learned to respect boundaries and the value of trust in a relationship.